from what one feels about Richard Nixon, his current situation as the most humiliated figure in American history is poignant and dramatic.

The moment of revelation was a moment of pure pathos for Nixon. The American people had trusted him, and he had betrayed them. His words were his own undoing, and he knew it. He was a man of great intellect and a master of the English language, but in this moment, his words were empty. He was a man who had once promised the American people that he would never allow them to be betrayed, and now he had betrayed them.
